Composition of Oils

Rapeseed Oil

This liquid oil is obtained from oilseed rape (Brassica Campestris), which grows in more northern latitudes than any other major oil-producing plant. Rapeseed oil production typically comes from the UK, Europe, and Canada (Canola). This is an excellent oil for all cooking ingredients and frying applications. Low in saturates, high in monounsaturates, and a good level of omega 3, 6, and 9 make this oil a good choice for the health-conscious.

Typical Composition %

- Saturates 7
- Monounsaturates 63
- Polyunsaturates 30

Groundnut (Peanut) Oil

Groundnut oil for oil production is grown primarily in West Africa, South America, and China. There are relatively limited supplies, and constant high demand, therefore peanut oil usually commands a considerable price premium over most other cooking or frying oils. Extremely robust, fries at a high temperature. Characteristics are slightly nutty taste and odourless.

Typical Composition %

- Saturates 22
- Monounsaturates 49
- Polyunsaturates 29

Composition of Oils

Palm Oil

Produced from oil palm, grown in tropical climates, principally in Malaysia, Indonesia and West Africa. The oil palm takes about five years from planting to first fruiting, so the oil production cannot rapidly increase in line with demand.

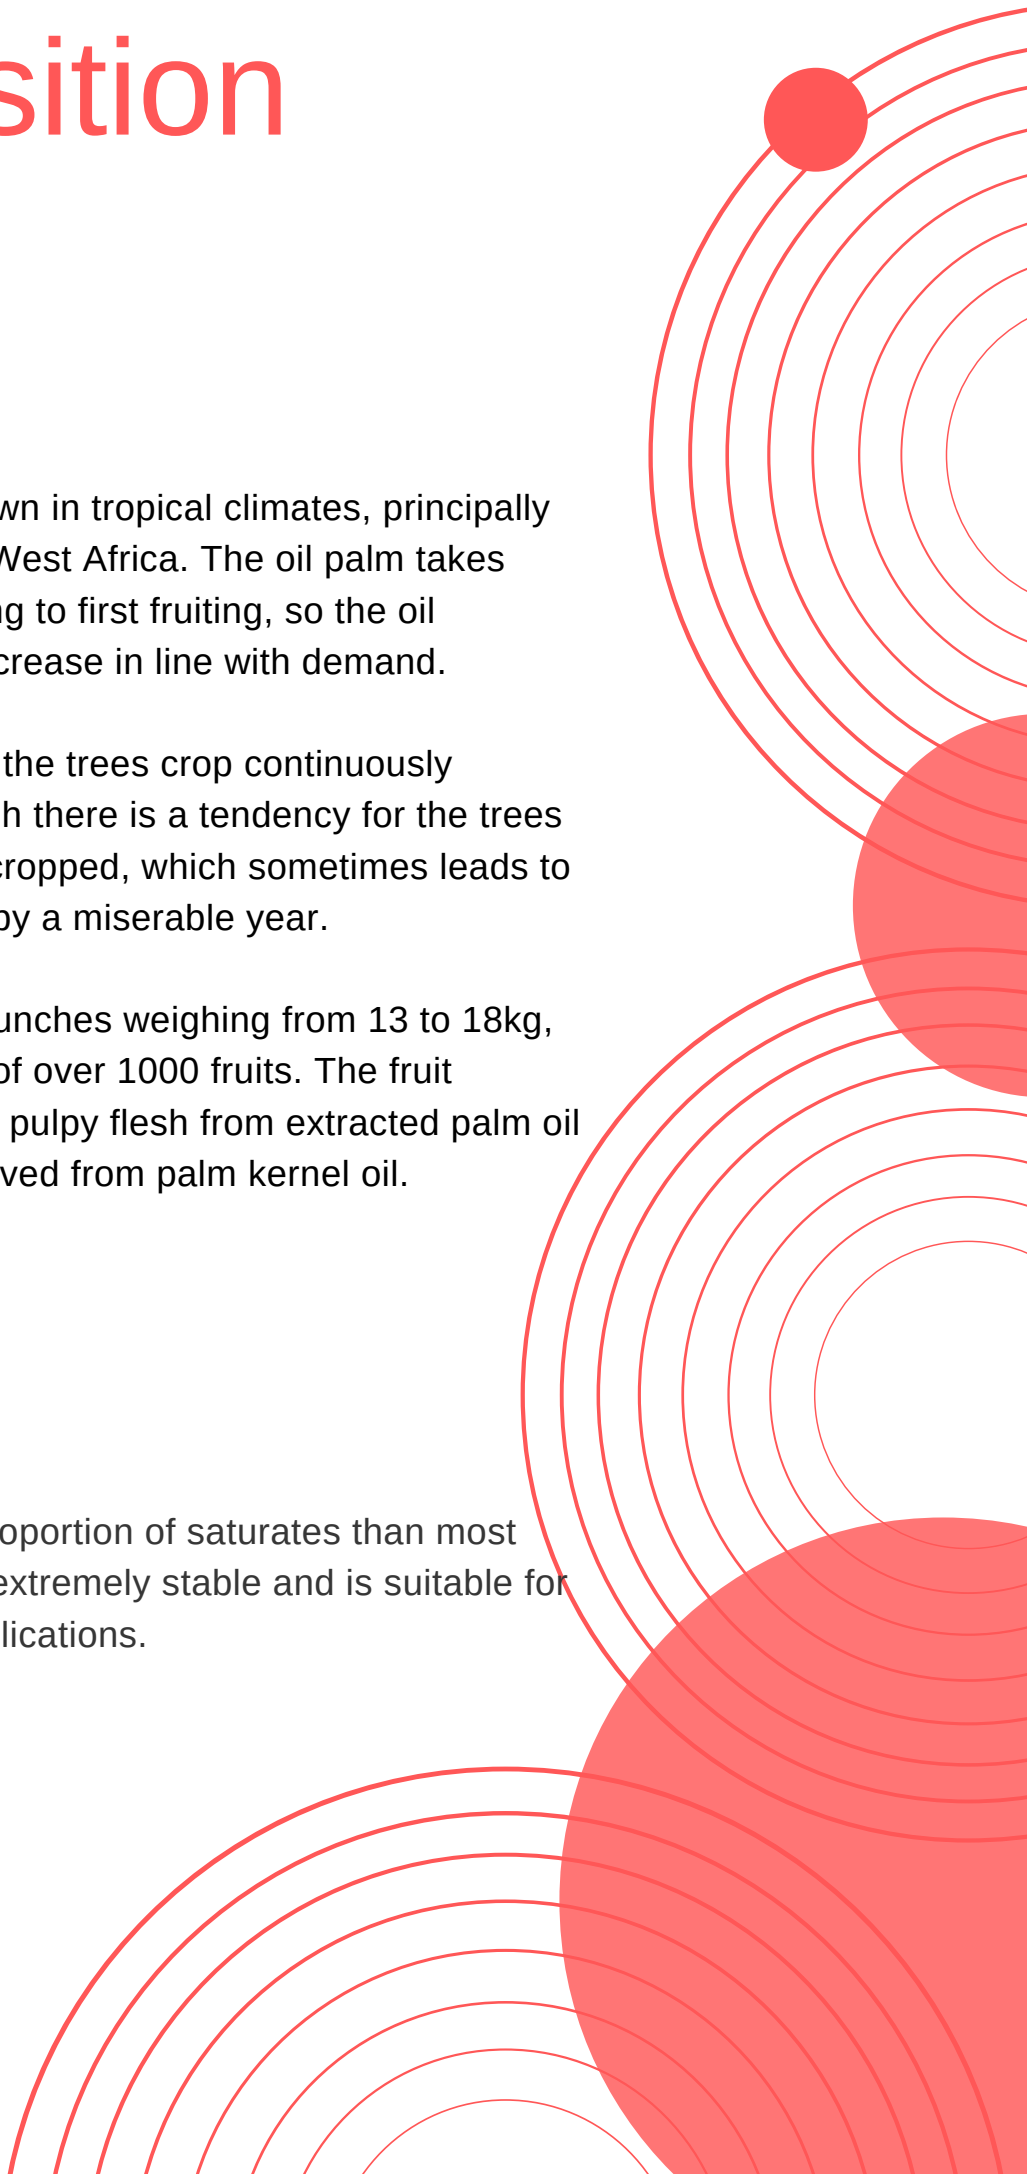

However, once established, the trees crop continuously throughout the year, although there is a tendency for the trees to become stressed if over-cropped, which sometimes leads to a good year being followed by a miserable year.

The oil palm fruit grows in bunches weighing from 13 to 18kg, with each bunch consisting of over 1000 fruits. The fruit consists of a fibrous layer of pulpy flesh from extracted palm oil and a hard kernel stone derived from palm kernel oil.

Typical Composition %

- Saturates 50
- Monounsaturates 40
- Polyunsaturates 10

Having a relatively higher proportion of saturates than most other major oils, palm oil is extremely stable and is suitable for most cooking and frying applications.
